PARENT TIME: We've all had those moments. We've lost patience with our kids, said something we wish we hadn't, or used a tone that we know hurt them. These parenting moments happen, but it's what we do next that makes a difference. Apologizing to our kids might be the most humbling thing a parent does. But it teaches our kids so very much. When a parent apologizes to their child, it sets the tone for open and honest family communication. It tells the child that no one is perfect, but forgiveness and grace are available. And it allows the child to see how God continues to grow and develop us even into adulthood. Our sincere apology can have a strong impact on our kids. Visit TheParentCue.org for more ideas.
